GWENDOLINE DANE. By Mrs. W. H. PALMER.

At 11 o'clock of a soft April morning Alex Vincent stepped from the elevator at the fifth handing of the Equitable in a riding habit, building and entered his office a few. Vincent bowed yards distant. Mr. Vincent was a handsome vonus

During nine months occupancy ne hadn't had a dozen clients. In facts nothing ever came to the office but biffs and book agents, and he would gladly have avoided both. He was beginning to consider seriously what he was going to do about it. For the present, however, he did nothing but throw the window up, and sitting down on the sill gaze over the wide prospect that his lofty height commanded. The wide blue Charles, the low, rulsty hills, the thin white clouds were soothing. He sat and thought about Miss Marquand's musicale, and dreaded to turn about and face the perpetual problem of income and expenses. His reverie was broken by the

Vincent rather recoiled from the unconventional aspect of the scene. He liked the proprieties as he understood them. He expected a proper reception from somebody. He stood stiffly on the threshold, hardly knowing whether to
